DRINKS FAR APART IN SOME PLACES

It is difficult to comprehend the part that water, or rather the lack of water, plays in shaping the life of the desert. Mice and other small rodents native to arid regions have been known to live on hard seeds without green food for periods of several months or even as ng as two or three years, and nothing in their behavior indicated that they ever took liquid in any form. Similar adaptations are exhibited by a arge number of plants, says the Outing Magazine. The guarequi of Sonora is a member of the squash family, inhabiting a region in which the annual rainall occurs within a few days in the autumn. The base of the stem at the surace of the ground becomes swollen to he size of a market basket in the adult alant, and this serves as a reservoir for vater. During the hot, rainy season the hin vines are sent up, leaves are ormed, and the small, squashlike fruits formed; then the vines and roots quickly perish, leaving the guarequi esting on the surface of the sandy soil ke a bowlder until the next rainy season, when the vegetative activity is rege number of plants, says the Outing nowner until the next rainy sea-when the vegetative activity is re-soon died down in a very natural man-nor, all the plastic material and water not used being carried back into the tuber, which now goes into a sleeping or resting condition for another year. Six times has this awakening occurred, itself. A new phase of potentiality has been demonstrated by the transmission of dispatches by the wireless system from the fleet, 200 miles from Magdalena bay, to Pensacola, Fla. The distance the message traveled without retransmission was about 2,000 miles. But it was not the distance alone that was significant. It had to cross landward and seaward stretches, and this complication of service was an extraordinary test of its power and tractability. It has shown that direct communication by almost instantaneous processes between the two oceans can be accomplished, and holds out the prospect that with proper apparatus no part of the planet need be cut off from us. To attempt a forecast of what may be possible by the steady evolution of this system, staggers the imagination. We can hardly consider more than a single phase of its possibilities at a time, and one that is suggested as of great value to civilization, is the re-enforcement of the service of the Weather Bureau. Already much has been done. Warnings of great storms are sent to coastwise and incoming vessels as far as 300 miles from shore. But the achievement referred to shows that much better work than that can be done, and it is the belief of the head of the bureau that ultimately the dangers of ocean travel will be minimized by the wireless to almost a negligible point, so far as the elements are a factor. This, of course, means more money, but it will be expenditure likely to yield a rich return.—Exchange.

Company, was the last witness called yesterday. Mr. Ferry admitted that he was the man referred to by Mr. Lilley the man referred to by Mr. Lilley in the same of benefits of the company as the representative of a manufacturer "who never needed an order so badly in his life."

Mr. Broussard read that portion of mr. Lilley's testimony referring to Ferry's visit in the interest of his company. In that statement Mr. Lilley had said that Ferry said he had been promised a $20,000 order if he, Lilley, "voted right" on the submarine proposition; and that Mr. Lilley said he would prefer to pay the wireless system from the fleet, 200 miles from Magdalena bay, to Pensacola, Fla.
